

TEACHING AND LEARNING TO SEE: A STARTING POINT FOR EDUCATORS AT A JESUIT UNIVERSITY

*FACILITATED BY THOMAS LANDY, DIRECTOR OF THE REV. MICHAEL
C. MCFARLAND, S.J. CENTER FOR RELIGION, ETHICS AND CULTURE
AT THE COLLEGE OF THE HOLY CROSS*

Jesuit higher education is predicated on a foundational trust that learning to see and understand the material world as attentively as possible is a matter of profound intellectual and spiritual importance. It is no accident that Jesuits from the 16th century onwards engaged themselves vigorously in so many “worldly” scientific, scholarly and artistic pursuits. Helping students to see the world more intently – and conducting research to expand the ways that this can be done – is a key responsibility of educators at Jesuit schools, and is a responsibility that can be shared by Catholics and those who have other or no religious commitments.

This workshop, will explore, in an accessible way, the theological foundation of this worldview, include exercises that provide opportunity for personal reflection based on the particular work and discipline of each participant, and provide time for discussion.
